

FINEBOY PRODUCER

A practical strategy guide for independent artists who want to stop guessing, build real connection, and create a path toward their first 100K streams.

STRATEGY BEFORE STREAMS.

Fineboy Producer

The secret was never the stream count.

It was the system behind it.

Most artists are taught to think about music as a release: make the song, upload it, post the link, run some promotion and hope something happens.

That is not a strategy. That is a gamble.

The Secret Playbook is built around a different idea: build attention, create connection, turn attention into listeners, and turn listeners into fans. The 100K stream milestone is a useful target, but the real asset is the audience you build on the way there.

This playbook keeps the original framework of the 100K Streams Artist Blueprint, but reframes it around the lessons that matter most: identity, release structure, focused marketing, discovery, content, fan conversion and monetization.

I didn't start with a machine behind me.

My first self-recorded single was around 2015. There was no serious promotion behind it, no major platform, and no powerful industry connection pushing it forward.

Years later, in 2021, I decided to take music seriously as a path I wanted to build around. A big part of how I think about the work came from something my father always emphasized: hard work.

I also grew up with Michael Jackson magazines around the house, and one idea stuck with me: “Practice makes perfect.”

That shaped how I approached production, branding, strategy and helping artists. I learned that talent is only one part of the equation. You need a repeatable process.

Over the years, I have made 1,000+ beats and worked with 237+ artists. I have also seen artists move toward major streaming milestones by combining the right positioning, content, release structure and promotion instead of simply throwing money at a song.

So this is not a promise that one trick will give you 100K streams. It is a playbook for giving your music a better chance to be discovered—and for making sure that attention has somewhere to go.

Your first project is not about money.

Your first serious project should be about five things:

- Identity — giving people a reason to remember you.
- Audience — discovering who actually responds to your music.
- Connection — giving people a reason to care.
- Sound — becoming recognizable.
- Recognition — becoming familiar enough that people look for you.

Money can come from the attention and connection you create: performances, collaborations, appearances, brand opportunities and other parts of the music business.

The mistake is trying to monetize attention before you have built enough of it.

Build the Identity Project

Your music should not feel like a collection of unrelated uploads. It should feel like a world people can recognize.

The original blueprint recommends an EP as a serious first project because it gives people more room to understand who you are, what you stand for and what emotions you represent.

Start with one core emotional territory:

- Love
- Street life
- Hustle
- Party / club
- Pain / struggle
- Loss
- Motivation

You do not have to stay inside one emotion forever. The point is to make your first chapter clear enough for people to understand.

Identity Alignment

Your music, brand and personality should support each other: clothing, online personality, visuals, colors, artwork and the way you communicate.

If someone cannot describe what makes you different in one sentence, your identity probably needs more work.

Stop Treating the Release Like a Single Day

One of the biggest strategic changes you can make is to stop thinking of an EP as something you dump online all at once.

Use singles to create familiarity before the main project arrives.

MONTH	MOVE	PURPOSE
1	Single #1	Awareness + testing
2	Single #2	More data + curiosity
3	EP	Convert existing attention

Each release gives you another chance to learn what people respond to: the song, the story, the visual, the hook, the audience and the platform.

The objective is not simply to release more. It is to use each release to make the next move smarter.

Pick One Battlefield

A common independent-artist mistake is trying to promote everywhere at the same time.

When the budget, content and attention are spread across too many platforms, it becomes difficult to build meaningful momentum anywhere.

Choose the platform where your audience already spends time, where you can create consistently, and where you have a realistic chance to become visible.

- TikTok
- Instagram
- Audiomack
- YouTube Shorts
- Another platform that fits your audience

Then put the majority of your marketing energy there. You can still maintain your other platforms, but one should be the primary growth engine.

One audience. One clear message. One primary platform. Repeated consistently.

Don't Buy Streams. Buy Attention.

If your budget is small, direct stream-focused advertising can burn through money quickly. Your first job is to make people curious enough to care.

Use ads to introduce:

- Your personality
- Your story
- Your strongest music snippet
- Your visual identity
- A reason to discover you

The question you want the audience to ask is simple:

“Who is this artist?”

Once someone is interested in you, they are more likely to search for the music, watch another piece of content, follow you or listen again.

Build Multiple Discovery Paths

There is no single road to 100K streams. The strongest systems create several paths that can feed listeners into the same music.

Playlist Strategy

Playlist placement can expose your music beside artists and songs people already listen to. The original blueprint highlights streams, discovery and credibility as potential benefits.

Creator Strategy

Work with content creators whose audience fits the song. A strong piece of creator content can make people curious enough to search for the track.

Location Strategy

Instead of trying to own an entire country immediately, start with a location where the music culture, nightlife and audience fit your sound.

When recognition grows locally, it can create additional opportunities such as DJ support, club plays, local fans and performances.

Make the target smaller in your head.

100,000 streams sounds enormous until you break it into multiple sources.

PATH	EXAMPLE
Playlist	10 playlists × 10,000 listeners = 100,000 streams
Fanbase	500 real fans × 200 streams = 100,000 streams
Combined	Playlists + creators + fans + content can work together

These are illustrations, not guarantees. The point is to understand that 100K is a cumulative outcome—not necessarily one viral moment.

Think in systems, not miracles.

Content Is Your Discovery Engine

If people do not see you, they cannot discover you.

You do not need complicated videos. You need repeatable content that helps people understand the person behind the music.

Content pillars

- Studio moments — recording vocals, creating, vibing, reacting to your own song.
- Story content — explain what inspired the song, what it means and what you were feeling.
- Personality — let people experience the human being, not just the release.
- Proof — show real movement, feedback, performances and moments from the journey.

Aim for consistent publishing—at least 3-5 times per week if that is realistic for your workflow. The objective is not to constantly say “listen to my song.” It is to build familiarity.

Turn Listeners Into Fans

Streams are a measurement. Fans are an asset.

Your system should have a second job after discovery: turning attention into relationship.

1. Reply to people

Reply to comments. Reply to messages. Acknowledge people who support the journey.

2. Give the audience an identity

Create a name, language or culture around the community. Share fan videos. Repost supporters. Make people feel involved.

3. Give access

Show unreleased songs, studio clips, previews and behind-the-scenes moments. People value access to things they cannot get everywhere else.

The goal is simple: make the audience feel like they are part of the story.

Simple Ads That Create Curiosity

You do not need a complicated campaign to test whether people respond to you.

Ad idea: Song snippet

Use the strongest part of the song with a simple curiosity-driven message, for example: “New artist in Lagos. What do you think?”

Ad idea: Artist introduction

Talk directly to camera: introduce yourself, explain what you make and point people toward the song.

Ad budget structure

- Small budget → focus on one city or tightly defined audience.
- Test creative before increasing spend.
- Keep the message about discovery and connection, not empty stream numbers.
- Track what gets attention and use the result to improve the next piece of content.

Recognition Creates Opportunities

Streaming is not the only outcome worth building toward.

As your music becomes recognized in a location or community, opportunities can include:

- Club performances
- Event bookings
- Campus shows
- Brand appearances
- Collaborations
- Other live opportunities

The original blueprint makes an important point: streams alone rarely make an artist financially successful early. Recognition can create opportunities that exist beyond the DSP.

Build attention that can travel into the real world.

Your 30-Day Execution Plan

Use this as a simple operating system rather than trying to do everything at once.

WEEK	FOCUS	ACTION
1	Identity	Define your sound, story, audience, visual direction and core emotional theme.
2	Content	Create and publish repeatable content around the artist and music.
3	Discovery	Test one primary platform, creator opportunities, playlists or local audience tactics.
4	Optimization	Study what got attention, improve the strongest ideas and plan the next release.

At the end of 30 days, you should have more information than you had at the beginning. That information is what makes your next move smarter.

Stop asking only:

“How do I get streams?”

Start asking:

“How do I create connection?”

Because connection creates attention. Attention creates discovery. Discovery creates listeners. And listeners can become fans.

The goal is not simply 100K streams. The goal is 100K streams with a foundation you can build on.

Do not rush the process. Build identity. Build connection. Build recognition.

I created this because I know what it feels like to make music without having everything figured out.

My own journey started before I had a real system. I learned by doing, making mistakes, practicing, studying and eventually helping other artists navigate the same problems.

The biggest lesson I would give any serious independent artist is this: stop treating every release like a lottery ticket.

Your music deserves a strategy.

You do not need to know everything today. But you do need to start making intentional decisions: who you are, who you are speaking to, where you will find them, what you will say, and how you will turn attention into a relationship.

That is what The Secret Playbook is for.
